FROM YOUR PARISH PRIEST

This week the Church remembers St Paul Miki and his companions, the martyrs of Japan. Their story is not especially well known and yet it is one of the most striking witnesses to Catholic faith in the face of fear and extreme violence. Christianity arrived in Japan in the sixteenth century, brought by missionaries who were initially welcomed. For a time, the faith grew quickly. Communities formed, catechists were trained and local vocations emerged. Paul Miki himself was Japanese by birth, educated by the Jesuits and became a gifted preacher. He knew his culture well, spoke clearly and could explain the faith in a way his own people understood.

Over time, however, political attitudes changed. Christianity began to be seen as a threat, not because it encouraged rebellion but because it taught allegiance to a truth greater than the state. The authorities feared a faith that could not be fully controlled and as always, persecution followed. In 1597, Paul Miki and twenty-five others were arrested. Some were priests, some were religious and some were laypeople. They included young and old, missionaries and local Catholics. They were forced to march hundreds of miles to Nagasaki, where they were crucified on a hillside overlooking the city.

What is most striking is not simply the brutality of their deaths but the calm clarity of their faith. Paul Miki preached a sermon from the cross as he was dying. He did not curse his executioners or plead for his life. He spoke instead of forgiveness, of Christ and of eternal life. His final witness was not dramatic defiance but peaceful conviction. The martyrs of Japan remind us that faith is not always tested by sudden crisis. More often than not, it is tested by pressure. Pressure to be quiet. Pressure to blend in. Pressure to treat faith as something private and optional rather than something that shapes how we live. The martyrs of Japan refused to treat faith as a cultural accessory. For them, Christ was not an idea or a philosophy. He was Lord. That conviction cost them everything.

It is always easy to think that the stories of the martyrs belong to another time and another place. Yet the questions they raise are still very much alive. What happens when faith becomes inconvenient? What do we do when Christian belief sits uneasily with the values around us? Do we quietly step back, or do we remain faithful, even when it costs us something? Most of us, God willing, will never face the kind of persecution that St Paul Miki and his companions endured. But we are not exempt from challenge. Faith today is often questioned, marginalised and misunderstood. Catholic teaching on life, dignity, forgiveness and truth can be dismissed as outdated or even harmful. In subtle ways we are encouraged to keep quiet.

When the persecution in Japan intensified, Christianity was driven underground and yet it survived. Hidden communities continued to baptise, to pray and to pass on the faith quietly from one generation to the next. There was not a priest on the islands for a hundred years and yet, the blood of the martyrs did not destroy the Church. It sustained it. In 1865 French missionaries arrived astonished to find secret communities of baptised Japanese Catholics who had never seen the Holy Mass but knew exactly what it was and begged then to celebrate it for them.

The feast of St Paul Miki and the Martyrs of Japan invite us to examine our own faith. Not with shame but with honesty. Where are we tempted to compromise? Where do we find it hard to speak or to live as Christians? And where might God be asking us simply to remain faithful?

God bless you all,
Fr Hilton
