FROM YOUR PARISH PRIEST

As we reach this Fifth Sunday of Lent, we stand on the threshold of Passiontide, a sacred stretch of days that ushers us into the heart of the Church's liturgical year: Holy Week. The shift is palpable. The statues and crosses are now draped in purple veils, their familiar forms obscured from view. This ancient tradition, steeped in meaning, invites us to pause and ponder as we prepare to walk with Jesus through His Passion, Death, and triumphant Resurrection. But why do we veil these sacred images, and what does this practice reveal about our journey toward Easter?

Historically, it draws inspiration from the Gospel of John, where Jesus, sensing the shadow of the Cross drawing near, declares, "I am going away, and you will seek me, and you will die in your sin. Where I am going, you cannot come" (John 8:21). These words hint at a separation, a moment when the full revelation of Christ's glory would be hidden from human eyes. The veils reflect this reality: just as the world failed to recognise the Son of God in His suffering, so too are the statues and crosses—symbols of divine presence—cloaked, urging us to look deeper. They remind us that the path to glory winds through the desolation of Calvary, where love is proven not in triumph but in sacrifice.

This practice has roots that stretch back centuries, emerging in the early Church as a way to heighten the solemnity of the season. In medieval times, the veiling was even more dramatic, with large cloths—sometimes called "hunger cloths"—covering entire altars or separating the sanctuary from the congregation. Today, the simpler veiling of statues and crosses carries forward that same spirit. The purple hue of the fabric, a colour long associated with penance and royalty, speaks to both the sorrow of Christ's Passion and the dignity of His kingship, a kingship revealed not on a throne but on the Cross.

But the veils do more than recall history—they speak to our hearts today. They create a stark, almost unsettling shift in our churches. The saints who inspire us, the Crucified Lord who comforts us—these images we've come to rely on are suddenly out of sight. This absence stirs a sense of longing, a spiritual hunger that mirrors the fasting and penance of Lent. It's as if the Church is inviting us to let go of the familiar, to strip away the distractions that so often clutter our lives, and to focus solely on the One who is at the centre of it all. In a world that bombards us with noise and images, the veils offer a rare gift: silence, simplicity, and space to reflect.

This act of veiling also prepares us for the drama of Holy Week. They remind us that the account we're entering is not one of immediate triumph but of patient endurance. When the veils are finally removed at the Easter Vigil, and the church erupts in light and song, the unveiling becomes a powerful symbol of Christ's victory over death. The contrast between the hiddenness of Passiontide and the radiance of Easter morning deepens our joy, making the Resurrection feel not just like an event, but a revelation.

The veiled statues are not just decorations—they're teachers, guiding us toward a more intentional Lent. They ask us to consider: What do I need to "veil" in my own life to see Christ more clearly? What comforts or habits might I set aside to make room for prayer, repentance, and love? As we approach Holy Week, the veils challenge us to walk with Jesus not as distant observers, but as disciples willing to share in His suffering so we can also share in His glory.

So, as you notice the purple cloths in church this Passiontide, let them draw you into the mystery of Christ's love. Let them remind you that the Cross, though heavy, is not the end of the story. And let them prepare your heart for the holiest days of the year, when we'll stand together at the empty tomb, marvelling at the power of a God who turns sacrifice into salvation. May this season of veiling and unveiling bring us closer to Him who gave everything for us, leading us through the Cross to the light of Easter.

God Bless you all, Fr Hilton
